Henry Cat and Milton Mouse are wonderful smokers. They try to outdo each other in blowing rings, fantastic elephants and various creatures of smoke. In the midst of their contest a mysterious prescription is dropped to them and they rush off to Hen Hong's Chinese drug store. A monkey clerk understands the queer writing and extracts a bottle from a boot at the side of the counter. With prospects of a jolly round of drinks, Henry and Milton drag their bottle away. The cork proves very obstinate and neither animal can dislodge it. Henry observes Phil Pig with his corkscrew tail, and asks his help. Phil willingly drills his tail into the cork. Phil runs in one direction while Henry and Milton hold on to the cork. It does not budge. The pig runs away with the bottle still on his tail. Reaching a garage, Milton applies some oil to the cork. This is what is needed and when Phil pulls at the cork it comes out "pop" and the Pig is thrown through the air into a sausage machine and out again. Meanwhile, Henry and Milton try in vain to stop the steady stream of liquor shooting geyser-like from the bottle. Suddenly the Cat and Mouse are carried aloft upon the top of the geyser, and are thoroughly saturated with the intoxicating beverage. Phil runs up and knocks the bottle over. Then Henry and Milton fall to earth with a thud. The bottle propelled by its shooting contents, chases the poor Pig and he races for dear life. Henry and Milton follow at a safe distance. Phil manages to kick the bottle around and Henry and Milton have to run away. The wise little animals leap upon the bottle and are transported along at a rapid clip. They go up the side of a steep mountain and shoot off into space. After a ride through the clouds the bottle does a nose-dive earthward and crashes through the roof of a bungalow on the hillside. The accident sets fire to the house and Henry calls the Fire Department. All the apparatus of Dogtown turns out. Fido carries the hose cart, Sport drives the fire engine and Delbert Daschund carries the hook and ladder outfit. Upon the arrival of the apparatus, Henry seizes the hose and proceeds to quench the flames. Gradually the hose turns into a monstrous serpent which bites the Cat. Then Henry awakens from his dream and finds Milton Pulling at his tail. The pair of animals made a great start on their day's party but did not keep up with the pace. So we realize the truth of the moral: "Don't Start Anything You Can't Finish."
